DISTRICTING COMMISSION RELEASES REVISED CITYWIDE DISTRICTING MAP

Revisions follow after the conclusion of the second round of public hearings

New York, NY -The New York City Districting Commission today released a revised draft plan of the City Council district map at the Commission's public meeting held at New York Law School in Downtown Manhattan. Today's release follows the Districting Commission's timeline set forth by the City Charter. The map, based on testimonies from the public during the second round of hearings is available online on the Commission's website. The hardcopy version of the preliminary draft map will also be available for public viewing on display at the main library branches and at the Borough Halls throughout the five boroughs in the next couple of days.

At the meeting, Commission members were given a presentation of the preliminary draft maps that included adjustments of the district lines according to population based on the current district lines. The next cycle of public hearings, held in early October, will be based on this preliminary draft. Once the locations are set, the public is invited to pre-register for speaking time or submit testimony via the NYC Commission's website.

"There are many more views that need to be shared with the Commission given the significance of redrawing these lines for the next ten years," said Chairman Benito Romano. "We encourage the public to participate and look forward to hearing from more of the public in the second round of hearings."

"We thank the public for attending the first round of hearings," said Executive Director Carl Hum. "It is only through the public's participation will the Commission understand how communities are defined and that the next Council lines reflect the needs and diversity of our city."

SECOND ROUND OF HEARINGS

The Commission will hold its second round of public hearings throughout the five boroughs in October. Dates of those hearings are as follows. Information regarding time and location will be updated on the Districting site.
