U.S. Will Try To Open Phone Without Apple

New Plan for the F.B.I.; Hearing Is Put Off

By KATIE BENNER
and MATT APUZZO

RIVERSIDE, Calif. — The Justice Department said on Monday that it might no longer need Apple's assistance in opening an iPhone used by a gunman in the San Bernardino, Calif., rampage last year, leading to a postponement of a court hearing over the issue and temporarily sidestepping what has become a bitter clash with the world's most valuable company.

In a new court filing, the government said that as of Sunday, an outside party had demonstrated a way for the F.B.I. to possibly unlock the phone used by Syed Rizwan Farook, one of the San Bernardino attackers. The hearing in the contentious case — Apple has loudly opposed opening the iPhone, citing privacy concerns and igniting a heated debate with the government — was originally set for Tuesday.

"Testing is required to determine whether it is a viable method that will not compromise data on Farook's iPhone," the Justice Department wrote in the filing. "If the method is viable, it should eliminate the need for the assistance from Apple." The Justice Department added that it would file a status report by April 5 on its progress on unlocking the iPhone. Late on Monday, Judge Sheri N. Pym, the federal magistrate judge in the United States District Court for the Central District of California who was set to hold the hearing, agreed to grant the Justice Department's motion to postpone the hearing.

The change is a reprieve in the clash that has erupted between the United States government and Apple over how and when the authorities should use the troves of digital data collected and stored by tech companies. The two sides have traded barbs over the issue for weeks, ever since Apple received a court order last month demanding that the company comply with an order to weaken the security of the iPhone so law

A 'New Day' of Openness, Taxed by Old Grievances

Disputes Over Human Rights Mar Meeting Between Obama and Cuba's Castro

By JULIE HIRSCHFELD DAVIS and DAMIEN CAVE

HAVANA — President Obama stood beside President Raúl Castro on Monday and declared a "new day" of openness between the United States and Cuba, but old grievances and disputes over human rights marred a groundbreaking meeting and underscored lingering impediments to a historic thaw.

The two presidents, meeting at the Revolutionary Palace for the first such official contact between their two governments in more than a half-century, engaged in a frank and at times awkward exchange with each other and reporters. Mr. Obama at turns prodded Mr. Castro to submit to questions during an extraordinary 55-minute news conference.

Standing at lecterns in a cavernous granite-walled hall in front of Cuban and American flags, the two leaders traded criticism of each other's countries even as both said they were committed to continuing on the path to normalizing relations.

"Give me a list of the political prisoners and I will release them immediately," Mr. Castro said, asked by a reporter about dissidents his government has arrested. "Just mention the list. What political prisoners?"

Human rights groups quickly produced rosters, distributed over email and social media, of people they said had been imprisoned in Cuba for demonstrating against or otherwise challenging Mr. Castro's government.

Mr. Castro sought to turn the human rights criticism on the United States, arguing that countries that do not provide universal health care, education and equal pay are in no position to lecture Cuba. He also said the United States military base at Guantánamo Bay should be returned to Cuba.

"It's not correct to ask me about political prisoners," Mr. Castro said.

Mr. Obama said he had pressed the Cuban president in their meeting over Cuba's treatment of dissidents and reaffirmed that he would meet with some dissidents privately on Tuesday. But he also assured Mr. Castro that the United States had no intention of dictating his country's future.

"I affirm that Cuba's destiny will not be decided by the United States or any other nation," Mr. Obama said. "Cuba is sovereign and rightly has great pride, and the future of Cuba will be decided by Cubans, not by anybody else."

The president went a step further, in comments likely to be seized upon by critics of his push to pursue an opening with Cuba, conceding that the United States
