A History of the Fire Department

Organized firefighting began in New York in 1648 when the first fire ordinance was adopted by the Dutch settlement of New Amsterdam. Fines levied for dirty chimneys provided funds for the maintenance of buckets, hooks and ladders. It was not until 1731 that fire brigades were put into service. Two hand-drawn pumpers brought from London were the first fire engines to be used on the colony. They were designated as Engine Company 1 and 2. In 1865, a paid Metropolitan Fire Department was established in Manhattan and Brooklyn and consisted of 13 Chief Officers, and 552 Company Officers and firefighters. New Year's Day 1898 was heralded by the consolidation of the Fire Department under the direction of a Fire Commissioner of the Fire Department.

A HISTORY OF FIRE PREVENTION

March 25, 2007 marks the 96th anniversary of the TRIANGLE SHIRT-WAIST FIRE which started in a fireproof building used as a factory and showroom located on the corner of Greene Street and Washington Place in lower Manhattan. The clothiers on the lower floors had closed up shop at noon that day, but over 275 employees were working on the 8th, 9th, and 10th floors of the building. The workers, mostly young women, earning $6 a week were eager for the overtime. At 4:45 that day, tragedy was in the making as someone yelled "Fire".

Engine Company 72 and Engine 33 responded, but the water only reached to the 7th floor and the aerial ladders only reached to between the 6th and 7th floors. Hundreds evacuated down the stairs or via the 2 small elevators. Three male cutters formed a human bridge to an adjacent building, saving several women, until the 3 men fell to their deaths. About 150 employees trapped in the 10th floor showroom climbed to the roof and were rescued by ladder to the adjacent building. Hundreds died by jumping to their deaths or were burned, huddled against locked doors. 146 lost their lives that day, but the fireproof building still stands - now part of the New York University.

As a result of the tragedy, a commission, headed by Senator Robert F. Wagner, was established to investigate conditions in the city's sweatshops. This resulted in the present labor laws protecting factory workers in health, disability and fire prevention. To enact the fire prevention code, New York City established the division of Fire Prevention. The original function was to rid factories of fire hazards. Among other restrictions, all doors must now open outwards, no doors are to be locked during working hours, sprinkler systems must be installed if a company employs more than 25 people above the ground floor, and fire drills are mandatory for buildings lacking sprinkler systems.

Since that time Fire Prevention's role has evolved and expanded as new hazards to life and property have been identified. Today the mission is evolving once more to include not only the identification of hazards, inspection and enforcement of the fire code, but the dissemination of information to first responders.
