Delicate Issue For Black Men Backing Harris

Confronting Views and a Prosecutor's Past

By ZOLAN KANNO-YOUNGS and ERICA L. GREEN

WASHINGTON — A day after Vice President Kamala Harris announced that she intended to seek the Democratic presidential nomination, more than 40,000 Black men from across the country convened on a virtual fund-raising call to discuss what the moment required of them.

For four hours, one Black man after another — prominent politicians, activists, entertainers — laid out the challengers ahead for Ms. Harris, including the racist and sexist attacks they expected from her opponents. In pledging their support, many offered emotional testimonies about the personal relationships they have built with her.

But it was not long before the men confronted the elephant in the room.

"Sometimes as Black men we get confused as to what strength is, and sometimes we think that standing behind a Black woman as a leader does not display strength as Black men," said Kwame Raoul, the attorney general of Illinois. "I'm here to tell all tonight that it does."

DEEP CHINA TIES PLAYED BIG ROLE IN WALZ'S PAST

35-YEAR RELATIONSHIP

From a Young Teacher to a Frequent Visitor and Beijing Critic

By AMY QIN and KEITH BRADSHER

In the summer of 1988, Tim Walz faced a difficult choice.

A newly minted college graduate from small-town Nebraska, he had just turned down a stable, 9-to-5 job after and moved across the world to teach at a local high school in China. He had made it as far as Hong Kong, just across the Chinese border, when People's Liberation Army tanks rolled into Tiananmen Square to crush pro-democracy protests.

Rumors were flying about possible civil war in China. Many foreigners, including other Chinese teachers, had left the country. Should he...
